I think we were hoping to avoid having citizens contact the wrong person to answer their questions or concerns, and that having a single point of contact would ensure that the right person would respond. This also allows us to avoid having different answers to the same question depending on who the citizens contact. With multiple agencies involved in the investigation, the process would parallel an Incident Command System structure.

That was the rationale, but if we are obliged to provide contact information for everyone who attended, then we should provide it. If not, I recommend keeping one contact person.

Hi there,

I've received a few inquiries from Triangle Lake citizens asking for the name, agency, position, and contact information of everyone from the agencies who attended last Thursday night's meeting. I would like to be timely in my response, so I'm giving you all a heads-up, and asking if you have any reason why not openly provide that information?
